LEARNING FOR A LIFETIME

When Reginald Walker III, recalls his 8 years at The Intergenerational School, he remembers his friendships. But not just classmates – he includes teachers, his basketball coach and mentors like David Atton. "Mr. Atton was my BEST friend," says 15-year-old Reggie, now in his first year at Benedictine High School. "In fact, Mr. Atton still is. We meet once a week at a coffee shop after school!"

Intergenerational Schools are multi-generational learning communities that excel at preparing students to be confident and engaged citizens in a fast-changing world. We learn from each other, especially through interactive experiences. At Intergenerational Schools children as young as five work with very active reading and math mentors well into their 80s, and many students, teachers and mentors in between. Learning with people who are different from us benefits everyone.

Reggie developed his love of learning in this community of small, multigenerational class rooms, from Kindergarten on. He learned how to make friends and help younger classmates progress. He practiced communicating in a respectful manner, which kept his relationships thriving for a decade. "I've learned how to listen, before I speak," Reggie added.

From day one, students learn to be independent and make their own good choices. Emphasis is on problem-solving, not rote memorization and conformity. When Math got tough for Reggie in grades 4-5, mentor David Atton began tutoring him once a week, using patience and humor to push down some of Reggie's barriers to learning. This strategy was even impactful when Reggie didn't make the basketball team. Instead of getting angry with disappointment, Reggie doubled his practice time, the way he did with math computations, and won a spot on the team the next year. Today, he's a stand out basketball player and a confident student at Benedictine, adjusting well to the rigors of its college prep curriculum.

Reggie credits his family, especially his Mom and Grandmother, for their inspiration and encouragement over the years. Reggie’s father passed away this year, “but I know he is proud of my accomplishments.” He has seen firsthand how community helps students grow, when it includes family, teachers, mentors and fellow students.
A COMMUNITY SCHOOL

Founded in 2000, The Intergenerational School pioneered a unique educational model that has received both national and international recognition, and has been replicated at Near West and Lakeshore Intergenerational Schools in Cleveland. Modeled on the belief that there is no better way to reinforce knowledge than to teach it to someone else, The Intergenerational School has multi-age classrooms that give every child the opportunity to both teach and learn. Additionally, our students learn with a lifetime perspective and benefit from daily interactions with a diverse group of young and older adults who serve as mentors, tutors and co-learners.
